WORK VALUES SCORING SHEET (PART 2)

In the columns below, write the numerical value of your response next to the statement number.

Assign a numerical value to each of your answers.

- “Very true” = 9 points
- “Sometimes true” = 6 points
- “Not sure” = 3 points
- “Not true” = 0 points

For example, if you answered “very true” for the first statement, you would write a 9 on the line next to the number one. When you have entered a number on each line, go back and total the columns of each heading. (Note: some numbers / statements are not included in the final scoring).

WORK VALUES CATEGORIES

Adventure

If you value adventure, you would be happiest in a career that offers some degree of variety or unpredictability. You won't want a job with too much structure or routine. Since you are probably a risk-taker, you might make a good entrepreneur.

Family

Those who value family are usually happiest with careers that call for evenings, holidays and weekends off. Flexibility is helpful, as is the opportunity to work at home. A career with a salary high enough to allow you to work part-time might be attractive.

Knowledge and truth

If you value knowledge and truth, you might find a career that lets you pass on your knowledge—teaching, for example, or being a librarian—rewarding. Or you might prefer a job that keeps teaching you: doing research, investigative reporting, etc.

Power

Those who value power need to prepare for leadership. Usually, that means some type of advanced education or years of experience in your trade. Most political leaders, for example, have law degrees. Business leaders often have a master's degree in business administration. If you value power, make sure that any job you take offers room for advancement. Or consider a business of your own.

Personal integrity and moral courage

You will be most satisfied in a career that mirrors your sense of purpose if you value personal integrity and moral purpose. Perhaps your field of work is less important than what you do within that field. For example, if you are a lawyer, you would probably be more satisfied working in legal aid than in corporate law. It is important for you to feel that your work is worthwhile to society.

Money or wealth

Many career fields have the potential to pay very well. Make sure that the one you choose meshes with your other top values. If you also value security, for example, you might find it more satisfying to be an engineer than an entrepreneur. Remember, too, that you will probably need to spend the majority of your time working. Is there a job you would enjoy so much you wouldn't mind if it also had to be your hobby?

Friendship and companionship

If this is your highest value, you will want to make sure that your chosen career involves working closely with others. Things to consider: Would you prefer spending your time with co-workers or clients? Do you like to see the same faces every day, or would you like to meet new people on a regular basis? Do you have a circle of friends for whom you want to reserve time?

Recognition

You may want to be recognized by more people if you are a TV star than if you are the best caterer in town. But, generally, you can earn recognition in just about any field if you do your job well. Choose something for which you have the necessary skills or talents, and work hard.

Independence and freedom

If this is your highest value, you may find unstructured sales—real estate or insurance, for example—rewarding. In this type of job, you can set your own hours and work without constant supervision. You might prefer to work part-time, or you might want to be self-employed.

Security

If you value security, you will be most comfortable in a job you know will be around for a while. No new companies or risky ventures for you. You may prefer to have clearly defined duties, rather than a loosely structured job.

Beauty or aesthetics

If this is your top value, where you work may be almost as important a consideration as what you do. Your setting must be one that you find visually attractive. You might want to work to center around beauty, as well—perhaps you'd be happy as a designer, an architect, or a florist.

Creativity

Creative people need room to exercise their imaginations, whether they are creating a work of art, inventing a better way to display merchandise, solving a problem in computer programming. If this is your top value, you should seek a flexible career that lets you put your ideas to work.

Helping others

If you value helping others, there are many ways for you to accomplish your goal. The service industry, in fact, is one of the fastest growing parts of the economy. How do you want to help others? Some possibilities: a paramedic, a social worker, a nutritionist, a psychologist, police officer, or a child care worker.
